

Nation Knows More "Secret Disneyworld Facts" Than Parts Of Its Bill Of Rights

ARLINGTON- According to a new report from the Pew Research Center, Americans are substantially more familiar with "secret Disneyworld facts" than with text from the Bill of Rights. Researchers say Americans consistently excelled at identifying Mickey Mouse logos hidden in Magic Kingdom attractions, whereas most were unable to summarize the third amendment.

"We were hoping Americans

The number of Americans who can identify Mickey's cufflinks is correlated with belief in states right would be able to intuit some limitations of the first amendment, based on how well they knew the map of tunnels below Epcot. That wasn't the case," sighed archivist Eli Solomon.

Though most respondents were able to provide an in-depth explanation of the calligraphy classes required for each Princess impersonator, most subjects showed "minimal, if any" understanding of concepts like probable cause or due process. "We weren't asking them to translate "habeus corpus" but if you're gonna take the time to master Na'vi it's a bit concerning, from a civics perspective."

Researchers claimed a small win by way of the second amendment. "A lot of folks shouted that one at us before we even started the survey. Little victories, I suppose," sighed one analyst.

At press time, experts released a "Which Amendment Are You" BuzzFeed quiz, in hopes of engaging Gen Zers.

Dinner Party Guest Presumed Smart After Repeating Phrase "Vertical Integration"

CHARLOTTE- Attendees of a Montpelier dinner party were wowed by a fellow party guest on Tuesday when the man repeatedly dropped the phrase "vertical integration" into their conversation.

"He was so subtle about it, like he vertically integrates all the time," said one partygoer. When questioned, no guest was certain exactly what the man did for a living, though the number of times he used the phrase suggested he must be a successful businessman of some sort.

"You don't go bragging about integrating vertically if you're some low-level pencil pusher," remarked Trevor Markum, a friend of the host.

Others complained the controversial guest was showing off. "Like, okay Elon, can we bring the discourse back down to Earth, please?" Sneered another attendee, listening nearby. When challenged to describe his own vertical integrations, the haughty eavesdropper stammered something about the dot-com bubble before hastily leaving the event.

At press time, the presumed business tycoon was heard praising synergy to assembled guests.

More Inside:

Goth Patient Receives Demon Heart Transplant

Page 2?

Herbie The Love Bug Crosses Street To Avoid Talking with Lindsay Lohan

Page 877-393-4448

Cuteness Overload: This Baby's First Words Were "Free Bobby Shmurda"

Page Deux

Message From Man On Desert Island Just List Of Willem Dafoe's Best Roles

Page 401K

NATO to Send 11,000 Sad Reacts to Ukraine to Combat Russians

Page Z100

Chik-Fil-A Customer Waits for Server to Bless Food Before Eating

LOUISVILLE- Thanking the cashier and accepting her change, local woman Tara Quinn patiently held off from eating until the Chik-Fil-A staffer finished blessing her chicken sandwich combo meal.

"And may you draw strength from this, thy Lord's bounty, that you may resist sins of body thy equal," intoned 19-year-old Dominic Strauss, hovering his hands above Ms. Quinn's medium fries.

"I don't mind the fanfare but sometimes the food gets cold before they finish the Daily Collect," she said. A Lutheran by birth, Ms. Quinn says it's sometimes difficult to know when exactly she can dig into her Frosted Lemonade. "Just when I reach for my straw he'll start a call-and-response segment and we're back where we started," she sighed.

Ms. Quinn also expressed discontent with the franchise's waste management. "I used to hand back the sauce packets until I realized they print the liturgy on them, which makes it easier to follow along."

Customers unwilling to temper their hunger until the end of the waitstaff's prayer say it's a calculated risk. "One cashier tried to exorcise me for sneaking a bite of my Spicy Southwest Salad. Brought out snakes and everything," wrote one Yelp reviewer.

At press time, the Chik-Fil-A pastor visited Ms. Quinn's table to make sure she and her female partner were "just friends."

"If you do not wish to receive communion, please fold your utensils across your chest."

Top 10...

People Worthy to Wield Mjolnir

Only the most worthy can wield Thor's hammer, we've listed some below.

10. Doja Cat
9. The Brave Little Toaster
8. Paul Rudd
7. Betty White
6. Pee Wee Herman
5. This one raccoon that lives in Bethesda
4. Larry the Lobster
3. Ina Garten
2. Denzel Washington
1. Clifford

Point

By: John Callahan

Bleeds red, white, and blue

"These god darn snowflakes wouldn't last a day at war. If their country ever asks 'em to make the slightest sacrifice they'll whine and pitch a fit until they get a free pass."

Counterpoint

By: John Callahan

Mad he can't get a haircut

"Wear a mask at Costco? No fair, I don't wanna!"

Man Who Considers Himself a "Cinephile" Also Claims Happy Gilmore as Favorite Film

BETHESDA- Speaking through a mouthful of hastily chewed Mike and Ike's, local man Dave Yaris informed his girlfriend's family that he's "kind of a movie buff," despite common knowledge that Mr. Yaris's favorite film is Adam Sandler's Happy Gilmore.

"You could say that I'm obsessed with the craft," continued Mr. Yaris, who quotes Sandler's 1996 golf parody no less than four times a day. With no prodding by any others present, he went on to vaguely claim "underdog narratives" as his preferred genre, a subtle nod to Happy Gilmore's putz to pro arc to overcome Shooter MacGavin.

The 37-year-old toll booth operator said he would be hard-pressed to name his favorite director, but it would "probably be a tie" between Adam McKay, Todd Phillips and Kevin Smith. "Maybe Chris Nolan," Mr. Yaris added off-handedly, before noting that Nolan's films "didn't make me laugh enough."

The avowed film enthusiast also bemoaned the decline of theater attendance. "Some folks just don't understand movies as an experience," opined Mr. Yaris, who hasn't seen a film in theaters since 2004.

"But you've seen Billy Madison, right?" Asked Mr. Yaris of one beleaguered party guest.

At press time, Mr. Yaris was overheard re-hashing the entirety of the plot to Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me.

Brain Time with Mr. Math: Conversions

Hey kids! Did your parents put faith in the public school system, only to find themselves drafted into a culture war stoked by Facebook algorithms? Bummer, let's practice conversions!

3 meters = 1 Chris Evans penis

8.2 grams = 1 Kangaroo Jack DVD

1 gallon = 32 hummingbirds, blended

$4,627.33 = 1 FrasierCoin™

19 years, 11 hours, 37 minutes = 1 trip to buy cigarettes, apparently